and read "the plain

It will be able to perceive that his knowledge, even after five years' preparation of his case, was not complete. The whole of the Paris life of the young man, and of his family and of his relations, and of his friends, and of his politics. The claimant's mind on that subject was, he said, a blank; and he was confessedly ignorant of numberless things which Roger Tichborne could hardly have been conceived of having forgotten. His account of his love affairs with his cousin, which was manifestly the most serious episode of Roger's life, was so full of confusion and contradiction. The "four letters," which he said he first wrote five years before, in evidence of his intimate acquaintance with the relations of Roger Tichborne with his cousin, flourished successfully while only in manuscript with Mr Bulpett's initials; but could not bear, for five minutes, the quiet and unpretensions, but still searching and thorough cross-examination of Sir John. The whole of the matter appears to have occurred to Mr. Bulpett or the parties concerned, who were made parties to this disgusting charge, to inquire how, when the painful contingency to which it was said to refer should have occurred, Mr. Gosford, a humble estate agent near to Tichborne, was to grant away the only and beloved child of the great Sir Edward, of Tichborne-house, to a young man, who was not even known to the claimant in writing, and still more solemnly attested by him in the witness-box, this sealed paper related to many more matters—to arrangements to be made with property which certainly was not Roger's to dispose of. But again it does not seem to have occurred to these gentlemen to ask how Mr. Gosford was to proceed in these serious matters, and how he was to be able to do so, or how he could possibly produce an authority in which matters so painful and so essentially private were mixed up. In fact, the entire cross-examination is filled with inconsistent cies of this kind, not to speak of the incompatibility of the answers given with the documents in the handwriting of Roger Tichborne submitted to the plaintiff, and the acknowledged fact that the plaintiff's contribution to the strength of the case. The weakness of their testimony was fully exposed by the Attorney-General, in the course of that long and masterly address which must ever be memorable in the history of English jurisprudence.

The final break down of this extraordinary trial is striking and dramatic, as baffles a case so rich in marvels; but from the moment when the jury were empaneled the fate of the trial was sealed. It was not to be doubted, that partial success, and that way in which it has been so long sustained are marvellous enough; but all the good fortune of the plaintiff and all the numerous aids which he has required would not, if multiplied tenfold, have sufficed to have saved him from exposure when once the manifold points of his case were submitted to the slow but sure process of scientific examination in an English court of law.—Daily News.

A. Negro Camp Meeting.
The negroes of the city of New Orleans

It was embowered in a thick shrubbery of half-grown trees and a dense undergrowth of weeds and rank grass, and it was so completely hidden from the by-road which led up to it, that it was some time before we could discover an entrance, or believe, in fact, that the gathering was there at all. However, we suddenly, on turning a corner, came upon a little by-path, in front of which was a monosyllabic direction sign, the calling-words of which alone the windings and out between the trunks of the growing trees and the stumps of the former monarchs of the forest that had been cut down, we came at length within view of the meeting-place. An archway of interwoven branches was erected across the upper end of the path by which we had entered, and from that standpoint a very modest scene met our view. Laguerre was the first thing that attracted our eyes, and he was indeed the centre of the thrifty congregation from a large booth that fronted the alleyway, the attitudes of the drinkers, with their upraised glasses, forming a somewhat striking, if not dolorous tableau. This stand, however, did not absorb the entire custom of the meeting, as five others for the disposal of drinkables, besides a long luncheon bar, were ranged round on either side, forming the outskirts of the assembly. The booths were made of strips of woven beeches, arranged, as in the pit of a theatre, in the form of a crescent or half-moon. Then came another ring of negroes and whites crouched, all standing up, still in the half-circle formation; and then came the corps of red devotees, who had come to pray and expiate, and were under the gaze of a band of ministering spirits as dark as Erebus, although all of them were white, and some of them in their white robes, or other handkerchiefs, for they were somewhat larger than those men in a fashionable drawing-room, or even on a decorous derrick. These devotional gentlemen occupied a platform all to themselves erected in a booth exactly facing that in which the meeting-parlour of spiritual stimulants in another form. Hundreds of coloured people sat, and nearly half as many whites were present,
